I wouldnt recommend this marker if there are other choices. It is great for shooting cans in a backyard. It is great for shooting cans in a backyard. It was my first marker and i have nothing but complaints. I called it lightening because this marker never shot a steady paintball stream, the balls never went in. It was my first marker and i have nothing but complaints. I called it lightening because this marker never shot a steady paintball stream, the balls never went in the same direction, or would never strike the same place twice. Constantly chopped paint. I can not in all honesty tell you. I can not in all honesty tell you that its good. But, for a beginner playing woodsball, particularly against other players of the same skill level, this marker is sufficient. And so long as you are not shooting too fast it will work pretty decently. But as you will likely be using CO2 with it shooting too fast will cause the marker to freeze up.literally. And it makes no sense to use an HPA tank with this is most HPA tanks cost more then this marker package anyhow. Not at all very accurate, especially if any oil or debris gets in the barrel. Overall its good for backyard play or beginner games.and those only. Most of our kits now include extra orings based on common aftermarket additions, customer requests, and or orings that we feel are more heavily used in the kit. Our kits do not include any Square rings, X rings, Quad rings or UCup seals unless specifically stated. The insert includes a list on the reverse side explaining placement within the marker. Why buy orings at all. At the beginning, your orings have a nice tight seal and all of the air pressure is directed to the paintball as it should be, causing your paintball to be straight, fast and precise. Though overtime the seal is not as good and air can leak out around the now imperfect seal and that causes your paintball not to fly as far, as straight, or as accurate as it did when these seals where new. You might not even notice the difference because you have seen it change slowly over time so you have adjusted to how it is working each time you use it, but in reality you might have lost 1030 feet per second of speed and 1030 feet of ball travel. Losing any part of your shot is no good at all. This is especially important if you are in any kind of competition with your marker.
